

ROSA BONHEUR.

After an hour's walk in a thick wood, you perceive at the opening of the Thonmery woods an airy-looking building, on which the architect has combined iron, brick, and wood with rare artistic taste. From the cellar to the roof everything is graceful and coquettish in this miniature castle. Its irregularity is its greatest charm, and your eyes could feast all day on the turrets hung with ivy and the balconies entwined with honeysuckle; if your ears did not ring with a peculiar harmony, which detracts from your admiration. You imagine that in the barn near by an Orpheus transformed into an animal is chanting forth a chorus of Richard Wagner's; but after listening attentively, this strange concert is found to proceed from the bleating of sheep, the lowing of cows, the meowing of cats, and the yelping of dogs. At those bestial sounds, you know that you are in the right spot, and approaching the gate, you will pull the bell. A good old woman (an old servant, one of the last of a race fast dying out, called "devoted servants") answers the summons—

"Miss Rosa Bonheur at home?"

"When will she return?"

"I cannot say."

"Where is she?"

"We do not know."

"Not too often. We are both talkers. I should forget my brush and easel, and when I do not work eight hours a day I am dissatisfied with myself."

will not have them in sight? However it may be, I was surprised at the absence of that fine school of painters.

It was dusk when the Sovereign of Castle-by-conducted me to the gate. She walked beside me with a firm gait. Her masculine appearance, her robust frankness, and her rough gravity, made one forget her sex and her talents. One feels like calling her "Good old fellow!" to a friend of thirty years.

"I have in'd," said she, "no stone for my rude retort now. Have I succeeded?"

"Beyond all expectations."

"Come and see me again, will you not?"

"Certainly."

"Not too often. We are both talkers. I should forget my brush and easel, and when I do not work eight hours a day I am dissatisfied with myself."
